BERKELEY'S NEW PARKING POLICY

Most new housing projects in Berkeley will no longer have to build off-street parking, a move the city hopes will "more aggressively promote" alternative modes of transportation, such as walking and biking, and advance the city's climate goals. Developers who want to build off-street parking will still be able to do so under the new rules, but the city did put limits in place about how much parking they can build in transit-rich areas without requesting special permission from the city.
